Essay structure by English language

Both in Russian and English, the work consists of three parts: an introduction, the main part and the conclusion. However, each of the parts has its own nuances and rules.

Introduction: In the introduction, the task of the author of the essay is to tell the reader what this essay is about. This can be done by paraphrasing the title or thesis (if any), or by asking rhetorical questions. The first option is used more often. Usually the introduction consists of 3-5 sentences.

The Main Body: In the main body, the main task of the author is to present his ideas and arguments for or against the thesis. It is mandatory to use examples in the main body: from literature, from news or from personal experience. The main part of the essay takes up most of it, as it tells everything and everything.

Conclusion: In conclusion, the author of the essay must draw conclusions and sum up or express his opinion. This can also be done by paraphrasing a thesis (but it should also be different from the introduction), summarizing arguments or calling the reader to action. The length of the conclusion should be approximately the same as the length of the introduction.
